

Judaism and Homosexuality

Psychologist Martin Koretzky, Ph.D. recently wrote an article published in the Baltimore Jewish Times ("Judaism, Psychology and Homosexuality," March 16, '01) explaining that while science can tell us "what is," we must look to philosophy and ethics to understand "what ought to be." For that reason, he said, psychologists must respect the differing values of their clients and not impose a gay-is-good mentality on clients who seek a lifestyle of traditional sexual expression.

He also informed readers of the Jewish Times about JONAH, "Jews Offering New Alternatives to Homosexuality."

Dr. Koretzky is the author of an article about last year's American Psychological Association convention which is currently posted on NARTH's website, www.narth.com.
